INTRODUCTION

This directory is a listing of public and private agencies and private individuals that provide historical analysis to the Army. It is designed as a quick and ready reference for project officers or staff officers interested in determining who the experts are in areas of interest to policy and decision makers. The listings do not include those agencies which are purely concerned with the research and development or the evaluation of hardware. For the purposes of this directory, historical analysis is that portion of the historical process which focuses upon a pragmatic interpretation to the recent past. It emphasizes the impact of human events upon current issues. Necessarily this approach includes descriptions of events, interpretations of causes, and judgments on results.

The directory is organized into four sections and an appendix with general information on the storage and retrieval of completed analyses and studies. Listed in the first section are Army agencies and organizations to include mission statements, areas of specialization, past and present analyses, addresses, and major sub-agencies where appropriate. The second section contains private firms involved with historical analysis and includes purpose statements, areas of specialization, numbers of professionals employed, past and present analyses, and addresses. Consulting firms and individual consultants, their areas of specialization, studies performed/ongoing, and addresses are listed in the third section. The fourth section enumerates by agency name, purpose, and address, other federal agencies that do not directly provide analysis to the Army but do perform historical analysis of use to the Army. The information in this directory was gathered through responses to a survey submitted to private firms and military agencies identified in available sources and through discussions with the Army Staff. Data was clarified through selected face-to-face and telephonic interviews.

APPENDIX 1

Reference Systems

There are numerous reference sources available to those who wish to examine studies and analyses in either abstract or complete form. Basic sources would include the Library of Congress and the National Archives. However, these facilities sometimes require a lengthy search process before the desired information is found.

Some of the best sources are the military libraries associated with the school or command which conducted the study. A difficulty with this type of source is that these facilities can only file what is sent to them. In some cases the analysis is not filed outside of the office which managed the work. In the cases where the manager of the study was the Army Chief of Staff Office, the Pentagon Library should be consulted for assistance in retrieving the analysis.

The Department of Defense has established a reference center for information storage. It is called Defense Technical Information Center (DTIC). DTIC is a component of the DOD scientific and technical information program. DTIC contributes to the management and conduct of defense research and development efforts. This is done by providing access to and transfer of scientific and technical information for DOD personnel, DOD contractors and potential contractors, and other U.S. government agency personnel and their contractors.

A similar service for other federal offices is provided by the National Technical Information Service (NTIS). NTIS is produced under the direction of the U.S. Department of Commerce, the central source for the public sale and dissemination of U.S. government-sponsored research. The database consists of government-sponsored research, development, and engineering reports as well as other analyses prepared by government agencies, their contractors, or grantee. An increasing proportion of the database consists of unpublished material originating outside the U.S.

Finally, there are many civilian information retrieval services. One of the largest is the DIALOG* Information Retrieval Service, from DIALOG Information Service Inc. DIALOG provides computer stored database listings in subject areas such as science, technology, mathematics, social sciences, business, economics, engineering, and more. The databases of DIALOG contain over 80 million records.

The area of information retrieval is one of constant change and growth. New systems and sources come into being rapidly. Future editions of this directory will attempt to list more of these systems.
